Locals in Lebanon's northern Bekaa Valley are still reporting sporadic clashes between Syria and its adversaries, though they are calling for the US-led international coalition to end operations against the Islamic State group (IS) and focus on "creating stability" in the embattled country. IS was ousted from the last bastion of its self-declared "caliphate" in Iraq and Syria in late 2017 after a coalition of militias that included the Lebanese Army and Hezbollah (Party of God) helped liberate the cities of Mosul and Raqqa. READ MORE: Who is Syrian President Bashar al-Assad's main ally? Despite the removal of IS's so-called capital from Syria, the heavily armed group continues to maintain a presence in the country, mainly in the northeastern province of Deir e-Zor where it controls most of its oil infrastructure and also sets up hideouts in the desert. However, unlike other areas of the Middle East, nearly all residents of Lebanon's Bekaa Valley pay the Syrian government and its allies. Michael Safi, a Lebanese political analyst in Beirut, told Al Jazeera that "every city and town in the northern part of the country depends on the Syrian government". "Just like the Americans depend on the Syrian government to protect them and to protect their presence in Southwest Syria," he added. OPINION: Israel's demographic threat Since the US-led coalition's offensive started in September 2014, the Bekaa Valley has been a virtual no-man's land for anyone, except for Syrian refugees and a few journalists. As such, Syria's help was extended to every single aspect of life, including health, education, agriculture, electricity, water and roads, according to Safi. The valley's strategic importance is evidenced by the fact that the area is where Syria annexed the border with Lebanon in 1976, after Israel occupied the Golan Heights in the 1967 war. READ MORE: The Syrian people - They did not all choose Assad At the time, Syria convinced the residents of the Bekaa to swap their properties with lands on the opposite side of the border that were under Israel's occupation. But Lebanon and the US refused to consider the swap, and instead demanded compensation for the destroyed properties. Lebanon and Syria reached an agreement in June 2008 for the establishment of the eastern Bekaa Valley Border. That agreement, however, has not been recognised by the UN
